RABINDRANATH TAGORE
The Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre at the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, Singapore, pursues research on historical interactions among Asian societies and civilisations. It serves as a forum for comprehensive study of the ways in which Asian polities and societies have interacted over time through religious, cultural, and economic exchanges and diasporic networks. The Centre also offers innovative strategies for examining the manifestations of hybridity, convergence and mutual learning in a globalising Asia.

Research Projects

The Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre pursues a range of research projects within the following areas:

1. Comparative Diasporas: This project mainly focuses on the study of Chinese and Indian diasporas in diverse cultural and geographical settings. It will seek to understand the interactions, mutual perceptions, issues of identity, and roles of Chinese and Indian immigrant communities in history and in the contemporary world.

2. China and India Viewed from the Southeast: A Place of Mediation: As one of the hinges of world commerce, whose polities were relatively open, cosmopolitan, maritime and trade-dependent, Southeast Asia has always been a place where China and India learned about each other, and where the rest of the world learned about them. This project will compare historically the way the ideas and institutions of the two imperial centres were projected to Southeast Asia, and understood, modified, and passed on to others there.

3. Comparative Study of Religious Networks in Asia: This project pursues comparative studies of the historical spread of Buddhist, Hindu, Islamic, and Christian networks across Asia, the role these religions played in facilitating trading activities, and the ways in which they created cultural links among Asian societies.

4. Perceptions of Asia: Rabindranath Tagore, Okakura Kakuzo, Lim Boon Keng, Liang Qichao, José Rizal, Manhae and Benoy Kumar Sarkar had an imagination of Asia as an abstract entity, transcending the imperial and national frontiers etched by colonial powers. This project explores the intellectual, cultural and political conversations across Asia conducted by these intellectuals.

5. Maritime Asia: This is a wide-ranging project which incorporates studies of maritime technologies, maritime trade and commercial networks, shipwrecks, and early maritime connections throughout Asia. The importance of the sea in the history of many Asian societies has not been fully recognised and the project will bring a higher profile to this aspect of Asian history.

6. India-China Interactions during the Late Qing and Republican Periods: The interactions between India and China during the colonial period have attracted limited attention. This project focuses on the writings of Kang Youwei and Ma Jianzhong from China and Benoy Kumar Sarkar and Rammath Biswas from India, which have not yet been translated or researched, in exploring cross-cultural interactions between India and China from 1800 to 1949.

7. Web Projects: The Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre uses its website to mount a range of related materials as global resources for the study of intra-Asian historical interactions. This includes bibliographies, guides, working papers, translations, and integrated projects. We are working with the West Bengal State Archives to identify and digitize materials relevant to Southeast Asia and China-India relations.

Lecture Series

The Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre hosts three lecture series focusing on intra-Asian interactions: The Nalanda-Sriwijaya Lecture Series, the lectures of which take place within ISEAS; the Asian Civilisations Museum-Nalanda Sriwijaya Centre Lecture Series, which is co-organised by Singapore’s Asian Civilisations Museum and the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre, and the lectures of which are held at the Asian Civilisations Museum; and the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre-Singapore Buddhist Lodge Lecture Series (in Mandarin), which is held at the Singapore Buddhist Lodge:

1. Nalanda-Sriwijaya Lecture Series

2. ACM-NSC Lecture Series

3. NSC-Singapore Buddhist Lodge Lecture Series (in Mandarin)
   - Inaugural lecture: “The Beliefs and Practices of Buddhism among the Chinese Community in Kolkata, India,” by Zhang Xing (10 October 2009)

For details of these and subsequent lectures, please see: http://www.nsc.iseas.edu.sg

Archaeology Unit

The Centre’s Archaeology Unit was established in April 2010. Comprising Professor John Miksic and Mr Lim Chen Sian, the Unit is Singapore’s first formal archaeological unit. It pursues archaeological excavations in Singapore, as well as in Java, Sumatra and mainland Southeast Asia. Major attention is assigned to sites associated with the spread of Buddhism in Southeast Asia. The Unit intends to develop an archaeological field school for Southeast Asia. Current archaeological initiatives are: pre-development rescue excavations in Singapore focusing on the 14th-century settlement of Temasek, and investigations at a 10th century religious complex in Central Java.
Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre marks 150 years of Tagore’s birth with a range of events

RABINDRANATH TAGORE (7 May 1861 – 7 August 1941), the first non-European to win the Nobel Prize for Literature, is an icon of intra-Asian interactions and the Pan-Asian movement. He was also an avid traveller, criss-crossing the Indian Ocean several times in the early twentieth century. Tagore made his first trip beyond India in 1878, when he travelled to Britain to study. But his more influential voyages were to be to the countries of Asia after he was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1913, beginning in 1916 with a visit to Burma and in 1922 when he travelled to Sri Lanka. Longer visits to China and Japan in 1924, Singapore, Malaya, Indonesia and Thailand in 1927, and China, Japan and Indo-China in 1929 were interspersed with further visits to Sri Lanka and, in addition, to many countries in the Middle East and Europe. The ways in which Tagore was received and reacted to during his Asian voyages varied enormously, with some in his audiences considering him a ‘seer and patriarch’, or even a saint with “a great and tender soul”, while others rejected him as a “petrified fossil” who would maintain the oppression of enslaved peoples by “preaching to them patience and apathy”. The materialist radicals and revolutionaries of China, in particular, were vehement in their denunciation of their visitor, who claimed to be intent on saving the spirituality of the East from the materialism of the West.

To mark the 150th anniversary of Rabindranath Tagore’s birth, the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre at the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies has organised several events during the past two years. A series of four conferences examining Tagore’s travels in Asia and the wider impact of his ideas on Asia was the main highlight of these events. These conferences were organised in collaboration with Harvard University, Peking University, and the Netaji Research Bureau in Kolkata. The first of these conferences took place in November 2009 at Harvard University, USA, on the theme “Ideas of Asia in Tagore and his Times”. Speakers included Professors Homi Bhabha, Tan Chung, Kris Manjapra, and Saranindranath Tagore. There was also a concert by Pramita Mallick, a leading exponent of the music of Rabindranath Tagore.

The second conference in this series took place in Singapore in May 2011, following the theme of “An Age in Motion: The Asian Voyages of Rabindranath Tagore”. By bringing together scholars to discuss the Asian voyages of Tagore from both his own viewpoints and those of the officials, scholars, writers and artists with whom he interacted during these voyages, the conference elucidated the Tagore phenomena during the 1910s and 1920s. Cultural events at the conference included songs by Prabuddha Raha and a dance performance by Kalamandalam.

The Institute of Oriental Studies at Peking University hosted the third conference in August 2010. Entitled “Understanding Tagore: New Perspective and Research,” the conference included a range of papers from Chinese scholars examining diverse aspects of the Tagore phenomenon, as well as lectures by globally-prominent Tagore scholars such as Sugata Bose. Tagore’s experiences in China and Japan were a special aspect of the presentations at this gathering.

The final conference in this series was held in Kolkata in December 2010. Hosted by the Netaji Research Bureau and the Kolkata Museum of Modern Art, the conference was entitled “A Different Universalism: the Global Vision of Rabindranath Tagore and his Contemporaries.” The conference brought together scholars from a variety of disciplines and continents to explore the intellectual, cultural and political conversations conducted by Tagore and his contemporaries to articulate a global vision in the age of colonial empire and anti-colonial nationalism. It also examined the modern intellectual history of Asia as well as theories of universalism, cosmopolitanism and internationalism. Speakers at the conference included Minister George Yeo and Professors Wang Gungwu, Prasenjit Duara and Fakhru1 Alam.

In addition to the above events, in January 2011 the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre also co-organized the inaugural lecture of the Singapore Consortium for India-China Dialogue, where the Indian Foreign Secretary Nirupama Rao outlined the important role and legacy of Rabindranath Tagore in India-China relations. And recently, the Centre co-sponsored the performance of Tagore’s moving play Daak Ghar (Post Office).

As we prepare for the publication of the papers presented at the above-mentioned conferences, this booklet, which brings together some of the talks organised or co-organised by the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre, serves as a tribute to the Nobel Laureate who played a significant role in promoting intra-Asian understanding and interactions. Taking Tagore’s Pan-Asianic zeal as our aspiration, the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre strives to promote the study of cross-cultural connectivities and interactions through its various research projects, lecture series, publications, and cultural events.

Tagore’s Asian Voyages

Singapore

14 July Arrived in Madras. Stayed a few hours before leaving on the French steamer Amboise.

20 July, Wednesday Rabindranath Tagore arrived in Singapore onboard the Amboise. A very large crowd greeted Gurudev at Tanjong Pagar led by Mr. R.J. Farrer, President of the Municipal Commissioners, and chairman of the reception committee. He was garlanded by Mr. K.K. Pathy on behalf of the Hindu Association. A musical chant in honour of the Poet was rendered by the Indian ladies present. The poet then proceeded to Government House as the guest of Sir Hugh and Lady Clifford till 22 July, and thereafter was the guest of Mr. M.A. Namazie at his Siglap residence.

July 21, Thursday Tagore attended a reception given by the Straits Chinese at the Garden Club at Raffles Square. A large gathering of prominent members of the community, including Dr. Lim Boon Keng, OBE, were present. Gurudev gave a speech about India and China, and how Indian students needed to study Chinese history in order to understand their own.

July 22, Friday Gave a public address at Victoria Theatre about international friendship and the unity of mankind. The Governor, Sir Hugh Clifford, introduced him as “the greatest poet that the East had produced in living memory”.

July 23, Saturday Garden party at Mr. M.A. Namazie’s bungalow. The reception was held under the auspices of the Indian Association.

“You have before you one of the world’s greatest men.”

– C.H. Woolfe, Acting Colonial Secretary, introducing Tagore at Singapore’s Victoria Theatre on 25th July, 1927
Association. He was garlanded by the President of the Association, Mr. Ali Khan Surattee. Several hundred guests were present, and probably for the first time in Singapore loudspeakers were installed by the Standard Telephone and Cable Company to enable all those present to hear the poet speak. Tagore spoke about the glorious past of India and the need for his countrymen to support the ideals of Visva-Bharati.

July 24, Sunday
Delivered an address to the Chinese community at Palace Gay Theatre. The Acting Chinese Consul General presided, and Tagore’s speech was translated into Chinese. Tagore spoke of the cultural fellowship between Chinese and Indians. An “At Home” was given by Mr. M.A. Namazie at his bungalow.

July 25 Monday
Address at Victoria Theatre to a large gathering of school children and teachers. Mr. C.H. Woolfe, the Acting Colonial Secretary, presided. He introduced Tagore thus: “You have before you one of the world’s greatest men.”

July 26, Tuesday
Farewell luncheon given by Mr. Granville Roberts, editor of the ‘Malaya Tribune’. Those present included the Consuls General for Germany, America and France, and the German Consul in Colombo.

Malacca

July 27, Wednesday
Arrived in Malacca by the steamer S.S. Larut. Met on board by Mr. G.C. Dodd and Mr. S.C. Goho of the Tagore Reception Committee. Mr. N.N. Pitchay JP, President of the Indo-Ceylonese Association, garlanded him. Tagore stayed with Mr. Chan Kang Swi. Lunch with the Resident Councillor Mr. Crichton at the Residency. Gave a public lecture at St. Francis Institution on education. An amount of $3500 was raised by the public for Visva-Bharati.

Kuala Lumpur

July 30, Saturday
Arrived in KL by the mail train. He was received by Mr. Lok Chow Thye and Mr. J. Lornie, the British Resident of Selangor.

July 31, Sunday
Public reception at the Town Hall. Tagore was garlanded by Mr. M. Cumarasamy.

August 2, Tuesday
Attended a variety show at the Chinese Theatre Hall, which had performances by various Chinese Associations, presided by Chief Secretary Mr. W. Peel. Tagore gave a recital of some passages from his works.

August 3, Wednesday
Gave a lecture at Chunghua Theatre about Visva-Bharati, which was followed by some variety entertainment to raise funds.
August 4, Thursday
Gave a speech on India and China at the Millionaires Club, Weld Hill. Mr. Chong Yoke Choy and other 40 well-known towkays of KL were present. Address at Victoria Institution, presided over by Mr. J. Lornie. Tagore spoke on the unity of the human race and read poems from ‘The Crescent Moon’.

Klang
August 5, Friday
Gave an interview to the ‘Malay Mail’. At the Anglo-Chinese School, he was asked to read his poems instead of a lecture. Tagore remarked: “Klang is the only town in Malaya where I am recognised as a poet”. He recited from ‘The Crescent Moon’. The Chinese community gave an “At Home” where he spoke of uniting the cultures of India and China in service of the whole world.

Ipoh

“When the invitation from China reached me I felt that it was an invitation to India herself and as her humble son, I must accept it. India is poor, she has no material wealth, no political power, no military success to boast of. It shows that she has still something to give to the world..."
Tagore was a visionary, always forward-looking. In one of his lectures in China in 1924, he said, “I hope that some dreamer will spring from among you and preach a message of love and therewith, overcoming all differences, bridge the chasm of passions which has been widening for ages”. These were powerful words addressed to both the peoples of China and India, calling upon them to build a deeper mutual understanding.

– Indian Foreign Secretary Nirupama Rao

Chinese poet Xu Zhimo, who became a very close friend of Tagore’s, was asked by the Lecture Association in Beijing to accompany the poet during his stay in China and act as interpreter when necessary. Xu Zhimo was overjoyed to be able to wait upon ‘one of the greatest spirits the world has ever seen.’
He wrote to Rabindranath: “I am supposed to interpret your speeches. But to interpret for a great Poet! One might as well try to transcribe the grand roars of a Niagara or the passionate songs of a nightingale...”
A WORLD-HISTORICAL TRANSFORMATION is under way in the early twenty-first century as Asia recovers the global position it had lost in the late eighteenth century. Yet the idea of Asia and a spirit of Asian universalism were alive and articulated in a variety of registers during the period of European imperial domination. Rabindranath Tagore was one of the most creative exponents of an Asian sense in the early twentieth century. “Each country of Asia will solve its own historical problems according to its strength, nature and need,” Tagore said during a visit to Iran in 1932, “but the lamp that they will each carry on their path to progress will converge to illuminate the common ray of knowledge...it is only when the light of the spirit glows that the bond of humanity becomes true.”

On February 10, 1937, Tagore composed his poem on another continent, “Africa”, towards the end of his long and creative life in literature. Even more than the empathy for Africa’s history of ‘blood and tears’, what marked the poem was a searing sarcasm directed at the false universalist claims of an unnamed Europe. Even as the ‘barbaric greed of the civilized’ put on naked display their ‘shameless inhumanity’, church bells rang out in neighbourhoods across the ocean in the name of a benign God, children played in their mother’s laps, and poets sang paeans to beauty. The sanctimonious hypocrisy of the colonizer stood in stark opposition to the wretched abjection of the colonised.

In my book A Hundred Horizons I had claimed that Tagore was an eloquent proponent of a universalist aspiration, albeit a universalism with a difference. This specific claim was part of a larger contention that modern history could be interpreted - not wholly or in full measure, but very substantially - as an interplay of multiple and competing universalisms. Universalism, cosmopolitanism and internationalism are words and concepts jostling for interpretive space in new global, interregional and transnational histories. Different universalism in my connotation of the phrase shares significant common ground with the meaning of vernacular cosmopolitanism as evoked by Homi Bhabha or local cosmopolitanism as enunciated by Engseng Ho or rooted cosmopolitanism as described by Anthony Appiah while diverging in subtle points of emphasis. Both notions of universalism with a difference and cosmopolitanism springing from vernacular roots are dramatically at odds with the dominant discourse and debates within the charmed circle of contemporary British and North American analytical philosophy.

Champions of cosmopolitanism who
In order to contest the universalist colourless cosmopolitanism, the philosophical hubris of the votaries of traditions might be a better antidote than the legacy of the deadweight of the fluidity of cultural boundaries. The well as the flows between cultures and of creating and recreating traditions as fails to bring to light the dynamic process nature of inheritances from the past. It bounded and implicitly unchanging falters because of its insistence on the cosmopolitanism, this intellectual position corrective to the excesses of colorless inherited traditions. A useful enough proponents of reason embedded in universal reason is articulated by to cosmopolitanism based on abstract philosophical debate the opposition the lines of particular cultural differences. Cosmopolitanism, this intellectual position the opposition need to be put to the test on the ground of the history of colonial empires. Cosmopolitanism would serve as a weak pillar of any theory of human justice if it ruled out as illegitimate most modes of anti-colonial resistance. Fortunately for the idea, that was not the dominant kind of cosmopolitanism that animated the colonized world in the age of global empire. There were various forms of patriotism perfectly compatible with a cosmopolitan attitude that transcended the lines of particular cultural differences.

Within the terms of the Anglophone philosophical debate the opposition to cosmopolitanism based on abstract universal reason is articulated by proponents of reason embedded in inherited traditions. A useful enough corrective to the excesses of colorless cosmopolitanism, this intellectual position falters because of its insistence on the bounded and implicitly unchanging nature of inheritances from the past. It fails to bring to light the dynamic process of creating and recreating traditions as well as the flows between cultures and the fluidity of cultural boundaries. The history of colorful cosmopolitanism rather than the legacy of the deadweight of traditions might be a better antidote to the philosophical hubris of the votaries of colorless cosmopolitanism.

In order to contest the universalist boasts of Europe, it is important on both conceptual and empirical grounds to recover the universalist aspirations emanating from the colonized world. For scholars of literature or textual traditions an evocation of cosmopolitanism in the sense of generous exchange beyond narrow particularisms, qualified by the linguistic and cultural specificity of the vernacular, may be a sufficiently deft semantic move. For modern historians, however, universalism animates a field of power that can hardly be abandoned; it can only be inflected by the countervailing energy of difference.

The spirit of different universalism that appealed to anti-colonial nationalists may have been water-borne across the Indian ocean, but was never quite defined by an expance of water. It is best in this context not to exaggerate the contradiction between oceans and continents that has crept into some of the scholarly literature. The myth of continents has been subjected to a powerful indictment with some justice as a meta-geographical concept hopelessly tainted by the hubris of European imperialism. The idea of Asia, however, or of Africa, I might venture to add, was not a singular one and had almost as many variations as it had individual authors. More important, it was certainly at variance with the concrete expression of Asia invented by nineteenth-century European geographers and cartographers as part of what has been debunked as the modern myth of continents. There were strands within Asian thought-worlds that merely inverted and did not undermine the Europe-Asia dichotomy, being content to invert the latter with a higher order of value and virtue. That forms a less interesting dimension of the modern tug-of-war between Europe and Asia. Far more fascinating was the imagination of Asia as an abstract entity transcending the imperial and national frontiers being etched by colonial powers on to the physical and mental maps of the colonized, and thereby serving as a prism to refract the light of universal humanity.

The Swadeshi (own country) cultural milieu of early twentieth-century India, despite its interest in rejuvenating indigenous traditions, was not wholly inward-looking; its protagonists were curious about innovations in different parts of the globe and felt comfortable within everwidening concentric circles of Bengali Tagore undoubtedly was a powerful critic of worshipping the Nation as God and was horrified by the crimes committed by modern nation-states. Yet he loved the land that had nurtured him and never abandoned a basic anti-colonial stance. He simply did not want Indian patriots to imitate European nationalists.
patriotism, Indian nationalism, and Asian universalism. Aspiring to reconcile a sense of nationality with a common humanity, they were not prepared to let colonial borders constrict their imaginations. The spirit of Asian universalism was brought to India by two turn-of-the-century ideologues—Okakura Kakuzo and Sister Nivedita. Once Sister Nivedita introduced Okakura to the Tagore clan, a formidable cultural bridge was established between East and South Asia. Japanese artists Taikan Yokoyama and Shunso Hishida soon followed Okakura’s trail to Calcutta.

While the First World War raged in Europe and the Middle East, Rabindranath Tagore set off on a global oceanic voyage from Calcutta on May 3, 1916, aboard the Japanese ship Tosamaru. Traveling on this easterly route for the first time in his life, Tagore encountered a mighty storm in the Bay of Bengal that left no banks as if Burma was lying on its back and smoking a cigar. Closer to the city, the long line of jetties were clinging to the body of Burma like so many hideous, giant, iron leeches. Other than the Shwe Dagon temple, Tagore did not find anything in the city that was distinctively Burmese. He lamented the cruelty of the goddess of commerce: ‘This city has not grown like a tree from the soil of the country,’ he wrote, ‘this city floats like foam on the tides of time...Well, I have seen Rangoon, but it is mere visual acquaintance, there is no recognition of Burma in this seeing...the city is an abstraction...’

From Burma the Tosamaru traveled further east towards Penang, Singapore and Hongkong. The poet felt a sense of joy observing the strength and skill of Chinese labourers working at the port in Hong Kong and made an uncannily accurate prophecy about the future balance of power in the world. ‘The nations which now own the world’s resources,’ Tagore argued, ‘fear the rise of China, and wish to postpone the day of that rise.’ It was in the midst of another frightening storm in the South China Sea on May 21, 1916, that Tagore composed his song – Bhurban Jora Ashankhani- asking the Almighty to spread his seat of universality in the individual’s heart:

‘Your universe-encompassing prayer mat
Spread it out in the core of my heart.
The night’s stars, the day’s sun, all the shades of darkness and light,
All your messages that fill the sky –
Let them find their abode in my heart.
May the lute of the universe
Fill the depths of my soul with all its tunes.
All the intensity of grief and joy, the flower’s touch, the storm’s touch –
Let your compassionate, auspicious, generous hands
Bring into the core of my heart.

On May 29, 1916, the Tosamaru reached the Japanese port of Kobe. Tagore’s three-month sojourn in Japan represented the fulfillment not just of a personal quest, but the search for an Asian universalism that had begun at the turn of the twentieth century. Rabindranath Tagore’s direct encounter with the power and scale of art in Japan during his 1916 visit to that country led him to urge Indian artists to look east in order to pioneer a fresh departure from the Swadeshi corpus of ideals. Tagore was as impressed by Japanese visual arts as he was unimpressed by Japan’s tendency to imitate the worst elements of European nationalistic imperialism. It was only after rebuking Japan on that count that Tagore undertook the long Pacific crossing to North America on September 7, 1916. He then traveled from the west coast to the east speaking out against nationalism during the Presidential election season of 1916. He did not want Indian patriots to imitate the monstrous features of European nationalism and the territorially bounded model of the nation-state. Tagore’s critique of nationalism, however, was perfectly compatible with his anti-colonialism and his patriotic poetry.

In 1924 Tagore traveled once more by sea to Burma, China, and Japan. The poet’s entourage on his travels typically included a small but formidable team of intellectuals and artists. Mukul Dey was the artist who had accompanied Rabindranath to Japan in 1916; it would be the linguist Suniti Kumar Chattopadhyay and painter Surendranath Kar’s turn on a voyage to Southeast Asia in 1927; and the poet Amiya Kumar Chakravarty and writer Kedar Nath Chattopadhyay would go with the Tagore to Iran and Iraq in 1932. On the 1924 journey to East Asia, Rabindranath’s companions from Santiniketan were Nandalal Bose, the painter, and Kshitimohan Sen, an erudite scholar of Sanskrit and comparative religion (grandfather of Amartya Sen), and Kalidas Nag. Young Chinese actors of the Crescent Moon Society performed his play Chitra in English on Tagore’s birthday, May 8, 1924, at the Peking Normal University. On this trip Tagore reached the virtues of close interaction among Asian cultures. Stung by the passage of the Immigration Act of 1924 (sometimes referred to as the Oriental Exclusion Act) in the United States, some of Tagore’s admirers even established an Asiatic Association in Shanghai to foster solidarity among all Asians. In Japan, Nandalal had the privilege of being hosted by Rabindranath’s friend, the artist who had visited India, Taikan, and he was introduced to masterpieces of Japanese art.

It was as an intellectual pilgrim that in Tagore’s moment in the Malay peninsula gave him a chance to have a conversation with the Chinese literati. The Chinese had named the Indian poet Chu Chen-tan (Thunder and Sunlight of India) based on the following equations: Rabi=Tan=Morning Sun, Indra=Chen=Thunder, India=Thien-chu=Heavenly Kingdom (an ancient Chinese name for India).

July 1927 the poet traveled east from Madras on the French ship Amboise. ‘India’s learning had once spread outside India,’ Tagore wrote to Nirmalkumari Mahalanobis on July 15, 1927, ‘but the people outside accepted it...We have embarked on this pilgrimage to see the signs of the history of India’s entry into the universal.’ His only motive in making this journey was ‘to collect source materials there for the history of India and to establish a permanent arrangement for research in this field.’

The Amboise arrived at Singapore on July 20, 1927. All the arrangements for Tagore’s tour of the Malay peninsula had been made by Ariam Williams (Aryanayakam), a Tamil Christian scholar of divinity who originally hailed from the Jaffna peninsula of Ceylon. The poet’s stopover in the Malay peninsula afforded an opportunity for a rapturous welcome by Indian and Ceylon Tamils as well as Gujarati Khojas and Banias. The reception given to the poet by the Indian Association in Singapore attracted a large number of ordinary Indians – small traders, motor-car drivers, security guards from a variety of communities including Sikh, Pathan and Punjabi Muslims; Tamil Hindus and Muslims; and Gujarati Bhatias, Khojas and Bohras. Tagore’s gracious host in Singapore was an Iranian businessman, Mohammed Ali Namazi, who had come to Southeast Asia via Madras. Suniti Chattopadhyay was struck by the admiration in which this Shia Muslim family held ‘Hindu civilisation’ and found himself arbitrating in intrafamily debates on the precise nature and direction of the ‘Aryan’ link between Iranians and ‘the Brahman and Kshatriya castes’ of India.

Tagore’s moment in the Malay peninsula gave him a chance to have a conversation with the Chinese literati. The Chinese had named the Indian poet Chu Chen-tan (Thunder and Sunlight of India) based on the following equations: Rabi=Tan=Morning Sun, Indra=Chen=Thunder, India=Thien-chu=Heavenly Kingdom (an ancient Chinese name for India).
perfect was our harmony, one our thought, one our soul and one our body, - the unity of God and creature nigh. Verily I saw in you my elder brother guiding me in the ways of the world, teaching me scripture, tongue and behavior, and all that we need to exist.17

A full exploration of Java had to wait until a pilgrimage had been made to Bali.18 Tagore was soon to discover how ‘Hindu’ religious sentiment and ritual pervaded life in Bali, but in very distinctive form. During a silent drive with the ‘king’ of Karendasem a gap in the surrounding forest revealed the blue ocean. The king at once uttered the Sanskritic word samudra (ocean). Seeing that Tagore was astonished and thrilled, he gave further synonyms for ocean - sagara, abdh, jaladhya. He then recited: saptasamudra (the seven seas), saaptaparbara (the seven mountains), saptavana (the seven forests), saptta-akash (the seven skies): Having given a rather difficult Sanskrit word adri for mountain, he then ratted off: ‘Sumeru, Himalaya, Vindhya, Malaya, Hirshyamuka’ - all names of Indian mountains. At one place a small river was flowing below the mountain. The king muttered on: ‘Ganga, Jamuna, Narmada, Godavari, Kaveri, Saraswati’ - names of key rivers in north and south India. Tagore reflected: ‘In our history Bharatvarsha (India) had realised its geographical unity in a special way. That mode of imagining the unity of natural and sacred space had crossed the great eastern ocean to reach distant islands. Tagore also noted that neither the names of the Indus and the five rivers of the Punjab nor that of the Brahmaputra flowing through Assam figured in Balinese vocabulary. He concluded that these regions were not culturally part of the ancient India that had spread its influence across the Bay of Bengal at a particular moment in history.19

Upon arriving at the palace, Tagore and his companions found four Brahman priests worshipping Buddha, Shiva, Brahma and Vishnu.20 The next day some Brahman pandits arrived with a set of coconut-leaf manuscripts - one of them the ‘Bhishmaparva’ (chapter on Bhishma) of the Mahabharata. Arjuna was their ideal man. But there were subtle variations. Shikhandi, the half-man and half-woman, who rode on Arjuna’s chariot to undermine Bhishma’s ability to fight, had turned in the Balinese version into Srikanthi, Arjuna’s wife. The differences in the Southeast Asian versions of the great epics Ramayana and Mahabharata enabled Tagore through comparative study to advance some very insightful interpretations of plains-forest tension as well as issues of race and gender that animate these stories. In the Malay world Ram and Sita were portrayed as brother and sister who were married. Tagore tended to accept this version as the original, something that had been suppressed in later renderings within India. Such an interpretation sustained Tagore’s point about marriage as metaphor in the epics – in this case, Sita and Ram representing the line etched by the plough and the green of the newly sprouting crop respectively, both children of mother earth and yet bound in wedlock.21 If Malay literature had recreated the Indian epics as their own, Balinese dance depicted tales related in the Indian Puranas. But the ‘Hindu’ ethos of the island was no bar to Arab Muslims, Gujarati Khoja Muslims and Chinese merchants conducting trade.22 After his departure from the island Rabindranath wrote one of his most beautiful poems, Bali which was later renamed more generically Sagarika (Sea Maiden) of which the opening verse read: Sagara jale sinan kori sajala elo chule bashiachhile upala-upakule. Shithila peetabash matir pare kutilarekha lutilo

He was amazed by the extent to which stories of the Ramayana and Mahabharata suffused the dance and drama of the Muslim Javanese. The islands known as the Dutch Indies could be more appropriately named, according to Tagore, as ‘Vyas Indies’. Tagore’s pleasure in discovering India in Bali was disturbed only by news of the appearance of Katherine Mayo’s best-selling pot-boiler Mother India. Sitting on a hilltop at Munduk, Tagore wrote an angry denunciation of the book that was published in The Manchester Guardian and later reprinted in the American Rev. J. T. Sunderland’s book India in Bondage. From Bali Tagore travelled to Surabaya on the predominantly Muslim island of Java. It was sugar from here, he wrote in one of his letters, that now went into the sandesh (Bengali sweet) made by the famous confectioner, Bhim Chandra Nag, of the Bowbazaar area in Calcutta. Hosted by the family of the seventh Monkonegoro of Suryakarta, he was amazed by the extent to which stories of the Ramayana and Mahabharata suffused the dance and drama of the Muslim Javanese. The islands known as the Dutch Indies could be more appropriately named, according to Tagore, as ‘Vyas Indies’. One evening the theme of the dance would be the fight between Indrajit, the educated demon-prince of Lanka, and Hanuman, the monkey; on another the sultan’s brother would himself play the role of Ghatotkacha, a Mahabharata character, who had undergone considerable creative transformation in the Javanese variant of the epic. The verandah of the raja’s home... was decorated with beautiful silk scrolls on which events of the Ramayana were painted. The poet inaugurated a new road in Suryakarta, called Tagaro Straat. The temple ruins at Prambanan reminded him of Bhubaneswar in Orissa. In Yogyakarta Tagore was a guest of the Paku-alam. The Sultan’s daughters danced and the entire family got together to perform the story of the killing of the great bird Jatayu in the Ramayana. Tagore lamented the lack of more comparative studies of the epic. ‘One day some German scholar will do this work,’ he wrote. ‘After that by protesting against or substantiating that thesis we will earn Ph.D.’s in the university.’

A visit to the great Saiva-Buddhist temple complex of Borobodur proved to be something of an anti-climax. Tagore found it to be big in scale but not in majesty, but he was rather more generous in his assessment in his poem Borobodur. On the ship Maier travelling from Java to Singapore Tagore wrote what was to become one of his most popular songs:

\[\text{Sakaruna benu bajaye ke jai, bideshi naye tahari ragini lagilo gaye.}^{25}\]

(Who goes playing that plaintive flute on a foreign boat I can feel the touch of that melody.)

Another very well-known song She Din Dujane was composed in Southeast Asia at this time. As he witnessed a tropical storm gathering on the horizon in Penang, he wrote the rousing song – Kharabayu boy bege charidik chhay meghe. But it had been a hectic trip. Recalling Coleridge’s lines about water everywhere in the ocean but not a drop to drink, Tagore felt he was drifting in the ocean of time and yet could not snatch even an iota of it.

Tagore pursued the Buddhist connection further in Siam on the way back. In Bangkok Tagore met the prince of Chantabun who had published multiple volumes of the Pali Tripitaka in Thai script. His poem Siam composed on October 11, 1927, gave a final expression to Tagore’s search for a greater India:

\[\text{Aji ami tare dekhi labo Bharater je mahima Tyag kori aashiache apon anganseema arghya dibo tare.}^{26}\]

Despite Tagore’s obvious pride in ‘India’s entry into the universal’, three features of his perspective on Southeast Asia from the Indian Ocean deserve attention. First, Tagore makes a rather self-conscious attempt to downplay the episodes of military aggression in an attempt to highlight the theme of cultural exchange. This form of strategic essentialising gives a partial view of the historical relations between the two regions, but seems clearly designed as a prescription for models that ought to be eschewed or followed in the present and the future. Second, Tagore does not treat India as a monolith in discussing the ways in which cultural influences radiated out of the subcontinent to reach the shores of Southeast Asia. By contrast, there is a story of regional differentiation within India that is told along with an attempt at periodising the spread of such influence. The thousand-year old tie with Srivijaya was clearly one fostered by the Palas of Bengal and not by India as a whole. The attempt to date the forging of particular links across the eastern Indian Ocean is based on a study of the regionally differentiated literatures, cultural practices and histories of India. Third, the Southeast Asian negotiations with Indian cultural forms and products are regarded throughout by Tagore as a creative process conducted by active historical agents. There is no sense of hierarchy, for example, in analysing the many versions of the Ramayana and Mahabharata. ‘India’s true history reflected in the many stories of the Ramayana and Mahabharata will be seen more clearly’, he writes, ‘when we are able to compare with the texts that are to be found here [in Southeast Asia].’

The idea of Asia and the spirit of Asian universalism were in important ways products of cosmopolitan thought zones created by passages across the Indian Ocean. In this sense, the continent and the ocean were not necessarily in an adversarial relationship but provided different contours of inter-regional arenas animated by flows of ideas and culture. Benoy Kumar Sarkar, writing in the Modern Review in the 1910s, stressed both sea-lanes and land-routes in creating what he called an ‘Asia-sense’. By the 1920s most contributors to the same journal were more enamored of the oceanic connections that spread Indian cultural influences to Southeast Asia. I have sought to make a distinction between two strands of cultural imperialism and a more generous universalism that shaped early twentieth-century discourses on this subject. During the modern age it has been a constant struggle not to allow universalist aspirations of the colonized to degenerate into universalist boasts and cosmopolitanism be replaced by bigotry. The tussle goes on in new post-colonial settings. The outcome is yet uncertain, but the ethical choice before us seems clear enough.

Malaya and Java were great Muslim societies under European colonial subjugation. It was his desire to see Muslim countries with Muslim sovereigns that led Tagore to board a Dutch aeroplane to travel to Iran and Iraq in April 1932. Tagore's essay Parashye (In Persia) is much more than a diary or a travelogue by an acute observer of cultures. It is the closest thing to a real history among Tagore's writings based not just on philosophical musings but fairly solid empirical research. In Iran, Tagore was not just any poet, but a poet of the east. 'For the Persians,' Tagore wrote, 'my identity has another special feature. I am Indo-Aryan...I have a blood relationship with them.' Word had also spread that Tagore had certain affinities with romantic and devotional Persian poets and it was the brotherhood of Sufi poets, which eventually turned out to be the more emotionally charged aspect of the relationship. European race theory took second place to Indo-Persian poetry as the ground for commonality. Shades of Aryanism were drowned in the depths of Sufism. There was absolutely no occasion, Tagore asserted, when the Persians made him feel that they belonged to another society or religious community.

With his main identity established as a poet and an honorary Sufi, the highlight of his visit turned out to be the encounter with Saadi and Hafiz in Shiraz. Tagore had made Hafiz's acquaintance as a boy through his father's translations from the Persian. Hafiz had also been a favourite of the nineteenth-century Bengali social reformer Raja Rammohun Roy who quoted the Sufi poet to good effect in his Tuhaft-ul-Muahuddin. Overwhelmed by an effusive welcoming address with references to Saadi's soul wafting in the air and Hafiz's satisfied smile being reflected in the joy of his countrymen, Tagore pointed out that the only weight on his side of the scale was that he was present in Iran in person. Hafiz had received an invitation in the fourteenth century from Ghausuddin Azam Shah, the third Ilyasshahi sultan of Bengal, but if Persian traditions are to be believed his ship had been forced to turn back. Bengalis generally believed that Hafiz responded to the Ilyasshahi invitation with a poem about Bengalis having taken to crunching sugar now that they had tasted it in the form of Hafiz's Persian poetry.

At a reception in a carpeted garden surrounding Saadi's grave Tagore claimed kinship with the Sufi poets and composers of yesteryears; it was just that he used the language of the modern age. At Hafiz's graveside the custodian of the cemetery brought out a large square volume of Hafiz's diwan and asked Tagore to open it with a wish and his eyes shut. He had been agonizing about the blindness and prejudice that went by the name of religion and wanted India to be free of this terrible affliction. "Will the tavern's door be flung open," Tagore read when he opened his eyes, 'and with it the tangled knots of life unfasten? Even if vain religious bigots keep it shut, have faith, that by God's will, the door will open.' On that glorious morning the musafir (traveller) had a vision of Hafiz's smiling eyes beckoning him from another distant spring. Tagore had no doubt that he and Hafiz were long-lost friends who had in the same tavern together filled many cups of wine.

Tagore was entranced by the gardens and mosques of Isfahan. He visited the Masjid-e-Shah started by Shah Abbas and the neighboring Masjid-e-Chahar-e-bagh. He also crossed the bridge to see the Armenian church and related how Shah Abbas had brought the Armenians from Russia and what made them migrate to India during the reign of Nadir Shah.
Not surprisingly, Tagore compared Shah Abbas with India’s Akbar.35

During his two weeks in Tehran, he participated in as many as eighteen public functions. Persian music continued to intrigue him with its elements of sameness and difference in relation to north Indian classical music. On the violin Tagore was often played melodies, which sounded like the morning ragas Bhairon, Ramkeli and even the pure Bhairavi. The poet’s 71st birthday on May 6, 1932, was celebrated with great fanfare in Tehran. In return for all the bouquets, Tagore gave a gift in the form of a poem titled ‘Iran’:

Iran, all the roses in thy garden and all their lover birds have acclaimed the birthday of the poet of a far away shore and mingled their voices in a paean of rejoicing...
And in return I bind this wreath of my verse
on thy forehead, and cry: Victory to Iran!

The next day he met Iran’s parliamentary leaders and the poet who had translated some of his poems. He received from them an exquisitely produced volume of the poetry of Anwari.36

The journey towards the Iraqi border took Tagore through Kazbin, Hamadan, Kirmanshah, Behistun and Takibustan. The poet saw the various sights that had so enthralled visitors for centuries, including Darius’s carvings on the mountainside in Behistun and the glorious sculpture of the Sassanid age in Takibustan.37 From his hotel room in Baghdad Tagore could see the wooden bridge over the Tigris built by General Stanley Maude, which the 28th birthday on May 6, 1932, was celebrated with great fanfare in Baghdad. In return for all the bouquets, Tagore gave a gift in the form of a poem titled ‘Iran’:

From the beginning of our days man has imagined the seat of divinity in the upper air from which comes light and blows the breath of life for all creatures on this earth. The peace of its dawn, the splendour of its sunset, the voice of eternity in its starry silence have inspired countless generations of men with an ineffable presence of the infinite urging their minds away from the sordid interests of daily life...If in an evil moment man’s cruel history should spread its black wings to invade that land of divine dreams with its cannibalistic greed and fratricidal ferocity then God’s curse will certainly descend upon us for that hideous desecration and the last curtain will be rung down upon the world of Man for whom God feels ashamed.39

In a very early poem Rabindranath had wished he were an Arab bedouin. One day in Iraq he fulfilled his childhood fancy by visiting a bedouin tent. He was first served coffee—thick, bitter, black Arabic coffee. Then followed a gargantuan meal to the accompaniment of delicate music. Tagore and his male companions were deprived of the pleasure of watching a dance by the bedouin women, which only Tagore’s daughter-in-law could enjoy and report on. But he was treated to a war dance by the men with whirling sticks, knives, guns and swords. Tagore was just reflecting on how different his life nurtured by the rivers of Bengal was from the struggle for existence in the desert, when the bedouin chief startled him with the language of universal humanity. “Our Prophet has taught us,’ the chief said, ‘that he is a true Muslim from whom no fellow human-being fears any harm.”40

In late May 1932 the intellectuals of Baghdad organised a civic reception in Tagore’s honour. An old poet recited his poetry in a sonorous voice, which sounded to Tagore like tumultuous waves on the ocean. Once the flow of Arabic poetry had ebbed, Tagore spoke about Hindu-Muslim conflict in India. He invited his hosts to resend their message with its universalist ideal in the sacred name of their Prophet once more across the Arabian Sea so that India could be saved from communitarian narrow-mindedness, inhuman intolerance and the degradation of liberal religion and put on the high road to unity and freedom. I can do no better than conclude with the aspirational quality of a different universalism that was perhaps best expressed by Tagore in a poem-painting signed “Baghdad May 24 1932”. It can be read and heard today as an exhortation to people across the globe to awaken and weave together communities and fragments into a larger and more generous pattern of human history:

Abasan Holo Rati
Nibaiya Phelo Kalima-Molin
Gharer Koner Bati.
Nikhiler Alo Purba Aakashe
Jwlilio Purnyadine
Eksathe Jara Chalibe Tahara
Sakalere Nik Chine.

The night has ended.
Put out the light of the lamp of thine own narrow corner
smudged with smoke.
The great morning which is for all appears in the East.
Let its light reveal us to each other who walk on the same
path of pilgrimage.41

Rabindranath Tagore’s Vision of India and China: A 21st Century Perspective

India’s Foreign Secretary, Ms Nirupama Rao, delivered the inaugural lecture of the Singapore Consortium for India-China Dialogue on 13th January, 2011. Excerpts.

There is a heightened focus on Rabindranath Tagore today, as we engage in preparations to celebrate the 150th anniversary of his birth. This year it will also be 87 years since Tagore made his memorable visit to China. He went to China with a message of love and brotherhood that he felt symbolized the essence of the ties between the two countries. From all we know, his visit captured the imagination of Chinese intellectual elite, some of whom were overcome with admiration for his eloquence and passionate espousal of the civilizational strength of the East, while others especially young students in some of the Chinese leading universities, drawing directly from the ideology of the May 4, 1919 movement, were vehement in their rejection of Tagore’s critique of modern civilization. Even before his arrival in China in April 1924, Tagore was already a celebrated figure in that country. Chen Duxiu, one of the founding fathers of the Communist Party of China translated Tagore’s prize-winning anthology, Gitanjali as early as 1915. Guo Moruo, who was a writer of Tagore’s status in China in the early decades of the People’s Republic of China, was deeply influenced by Tagore when he was studying in Japan from 1914 to 1920.

It was during Tagore’s stay in China that the renowned Chinese scholar, Liang Qichao, presented him the Chinese name, ‘Zhu Zhendan’ which translates as “thunder of the oriental dawn”. Tagore was deeply touched. He truly believed in the mutually beneficial interactive relationship between the two great civilizations of China and India. He passionately advocated the reopening of the path between the two countries that had become obscured through the centuries. His international university, ‘Visva-Bharati’, played a pioneering role in development of Chinese studies in India. The establishment of the first Sino-Indian Cultural Society, and then, ‘Cheena Bhavana’ (Chinese Department) at Santiniketan were corner stones for this cause. Scholars, teachers like Tan Yun-shan, who led Cheena Bhavan for many years, contributed greatly to modern India’s understanding of Chinese civilization and her modern development.

The late Ji Xianlin, Padma Bhushan and doyen of Indologists in China, observed that Tagore was an icon of Sino-Indian friendship both in India and China. Ji Xianlin, much in the spirit of Tagore, authored the eloquent words, “China

Tagore said in his final lecture in China, “I have made friends.” However, this was not just friendship between the poet and his fans in China, it was in many ways symbolic of the renewal of friendship between India and China and awakening of their potential.
and India have stood simultaneously on the Asian continent. Their neighbourliness is created by Heaven and constructed by Earth.”

Our first Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, was greatly inspired by Tagore’s desire for India-China fraternity. He believed in the strong civilizational links between the two countries that had drawn them to each other in historical times. This civilizational link also inspired the ‘Panchsheel’ or the five principles of coexistence. It is also to be noted that for the last many years, Tagore and Nehru have been regarded as among fifty foreigners who have contributed most in shaping China’s modern development.

Tagore was a visionary, always forward-looking. In one of his lectures in China in 1924, he said, “I hope that some dreamer will spring from among you and preach a message of love and therewith overcoming all differences bridge the chasm of passions which has been widening for ages”. These were powerful words addressed to both the peoples of China and India, calling them upon them to build a deeper mutual understanding. In speaking of the need for “eternally revealing a joyous relationship unforeseen”, he sought to promote the cause of China-India understanding, envisioning the ascent of India and China to a higher platform of civilizational leadership and fraternal partnership since they together comprise 40% of humanity. In his view there was no fundamental contradiction between the two countries whose civilizations stressed the concept of harmonious development in the spirit of ‘vasudhaiva kutumbakam’ (the world is one family) and ‘shijie datong’ (world is one family) respectively.

Instinctively, he reflected the spirit of an Asia which had traditionally lived in peace, pursuing the traffic of ideas, the peaceful absorption of different religions without proselytisation, and trade and commerce across oceans that were not polarized but were neutral – literally zones of peace and a common economic space.

What is perhaps now well known is that apart from admiration for China, Tagore deeply felt the plight of the Chinese people. When he was all but 20 in 1881, he authored an essay vehemently denouncing the opium trade which had been imposed on China since that opium was mostly being grown in British India. He called this essay ‘Chine Maraner Byabasay’ or the ‘Commerce of Killing people in China’. He expressed similar feelings of sympathy after the Japanese invasion of China writing to his friend, a Japanese poet, Yone Noguchi, that “the reports of Chinese suffering batter against my heart”.

There is an impression in certain quarters that Tagore was a traditionalist. He was far from being one since he supported science and scientific modes of thinking. But outside India, as Prof. Amartya Sen has pointed out, he felt the need for the world to pay greater attention to the thinking of the East. And it was not as if Chinese intellectuals who leaned to the Left disliked Tagore. As I mentioned earlier Chen Du Xiu, one of the founding fathers of the Community Party of China was himself one translator of the works of Tagore. In fact, it has been seen that Tagore expressed the essence of globalization which is the “core inner instinct” that seeks to express the interconnectedness and interdependence of our world.

I believe that Tagore’s focus on Asia’s unique identity is of particular relevance today as we seek to promote peace, stability and prosperity in Asia. Instinctively, he reflected the spirit of an Asia which had traditionally lived in peace, pursuing the traffic of ideas, the peaceful absorption of different religions without proselytisation, and trade and commerce across oceans that were not polarized but were neutral – literally zones of peace and a common economic space. This was an approach defined by secularism and a complementariness of interests. This balanced commercial equilibrium was enhanced by the concept of spiritual unity. One has only to visit the caves of Ajanta or see the murals of Dunhuang in China to see the capturing through the eye of the artist of this vision of unity – with their depiction of various nationalities thronging royal processions or expressing their grief before a dying Buddha. In the 8th century, an Indian astronomer named Gautama Siddhartha, was named the President of the Board of Astronomy of China.
This tolerance and openness, lack of prejudice toward foreigners and outsiders, the spirit of enterprise and the absence of trade barriers, was unprecedented in the history of the world. I believe this is what Tagore meant when he said that we should have our past as a rough guide for the future.

When Tagore visited China, both India and China were in the throes of their own and distinct revolution. In some sense, Tagore, with his poet's love of beauty remained unaware of the visceral repugnance among the intellectual elites of China for Confucianism and traditional culture in a politically charged atmosphere. His vision was long-term and civilisational rather than ephemeral, approximating the millennium-long cultural contacts between India and China, in which he found a worthy model for sustenance of the Asian way of harmony and coexistence. This is why he interpreted the invitation to him to visit China as an invitation from China to India rather than to an individual, and 'accepted it as a humble son of India'.

In this sense, Tagore neither sought to perpetuate the political or social status quo of China nor impose the self-negating values of India, as his critics in China at that time alleged. Instead, Tagore's was an effort to shift the attention of both India and China from the West, whose power and prestige at that point were at their zenith but also produced war and turmoil, to each other as well as to their past glory and their harmonious contacts. Instead of taking a deprecatory view of their civilization -- aided by the then prevailing western critic of the Orient, Tagore wanted India and China as fountainheads of ancient civilizations to take pride in their rich heritage and draw from their past to build a future of friendly contacts.

While aware of somewhat unidirectional past contacts between them in the religious realm, Tagore did not attempt to persuade China to accept another wave of cultural influence from India. He merely asked China to join him in his experiment of building institutions based on the “ideal of the spiritual unity of all races”.

At the same time, the import of Tagore's influence for the revival of India-China relations should not be underestimated, because it had waned after the Song dynasty and especially following the advent of the Europeans. It is significant that all exchanges between India and China with lasting impact till this point were by religious personages. Tagore was the first thinker of modern India to be invited by the thinking elites of China, along with the likes of John Dewey and Bertrand Russell, as the Chinese grappled with the question of China's place in a modern world. In India, which was also facing pulls and pressures of different kinds, Tagore similarly sought to revive the spirit of unity with China and enhance understanding of this important country by pioneering modern studies of China and building on contacts with noted Chinese personalities.

Even if Tagore's outreach to China did not evoke the intended response during or immediately following his visit, his approach looks prophetic with the passage of time. At that point in time, Tagore said in his final lecture in China, “I have done what was possible --- I have made friends.” However, this was not just friendship between the poet and his fans in China, it was in many ways symbolic of the renewal of friendship between India and China and awakening of their potential. For instance, India and China were to launch the Panchsheel initiative exactly three decades later, drawing upon their civilisational values. The tenacity of these principles in the modern world of complex diplomacy and realpolitik shows that what is ancient need not be antiquated. Both India and China are today arguably more modern and confident in outlook than in Tagore's days, although India, with its tradition of gradualism, is often accused of lagging in its drive towards modernity. Be that as it may, both India and China today have the maturity to admire our past, including the past of our contacts, without getting overwhelmed or swamped under its weight. Our effort, as a pan-Asia initiative under the East Asian Summit-process, to resurrect the glory of Nalanda, is a pointer in that direction. The vision of Asian unity conceived by Tagore nearly a century ago, is close to getting realized in the process of community-building in our region.

There has been some criticism that Tagore did not offer any practical solutions to the problem of the day. One could equally argue that Tagore was a visionary who thought ahead of his times and the true relevance of his thoughts were not appreciated in his era. For instance, early on he foresaw the onset of globalization. On several occasions, he had mentioned that the most important fact of the present age was that all the races have come together and we are confronted with two alternatives. The problem is whether different groups of people can go on fighting with one another or find out some true basis for reconciliation and mutual help; and whether it will be interminable competition or cooperation. There is a striking parallel in how leaders of India and China have publicly articulated that there are areas of cooperation as well as those of competition between us, and that there is sufficient space...
Tagore's vision of sustainability on a global scale, his cosmopolitanism, and his humanism, are of immense relevance today when we stress the values of inclusive development, and environmental sustainability as also education that creates individuals who transcend national boundaries to become citizens of the world.

in the world for both countries to satisfy their development aspirations and to cooperate during this process.

Tagore also pointed that in our earlier history, when the geographical limits of each country and also the facilities of communication were small, this problem of cooperation versus competition was comparatively small in dimension. Again in the context of people having come close together, Tagore mentioned that their differences in language, tradition and degrees of strength are so apparent that "our first meeting has only recognized these differences and in the place of geographical barriers it has thereupon set up the barriers of mutual understanding". Again speaking on Asia, he said "When we in Asia talk about readjustment in response to the world situation today, we forget that it should be directed to a future of new ideals and not to the mere shifting about of the methods of the past." We are today indeed grappling with these very ideas as we try to address the issue of a strategic security and cooperative framework for Asia.

Since the venue of this talk is Singapore, I cannot but help thinking of how the most evocative visualization of the synergy between India and China has often sprung from our friends in South-east Asia. And here, Singapore has played a leading role. It was in Singapore that Tan Yun-shan met Tagore and from where he resolved to follow Tagore to Santiniketan when Cheena Bhavana was being set up. It is from our friends in Singapore that we often hear the most incisive commentary and comparative analyses of modern China and India. And, it is probably here in Singapore that you are able to best understand the imperative of closer dialogue and peaceful interaction between India and China.

Tagore's encounter with China did not culminate with his trip there in 1924. The idea of India and the idea of China – civilizations that could never perish – were guiding principles for leaders like Nehru. Until the unfortunate border conflict of 1962, the concept of fraternal partnership between India and China had never been questioned. The estrangement of the sixties and early seventies expressed an aberration that went against the grain of the inspirational words of Tagore and his belief in the geo-civilizational paradigm of India-China relations. The scholar Patricia Uberoi speaks of the post-Westphalian compact where the institution of the nation-state is defined by territorial boundedness. She writes how "with this come notions of centre and periphery, mainland and margins, and the justified use of force in their defence". Perhaps, as she says, Tagore would have thought of frontier zones as "revolving doors- as creative spaces where civilizations meet, and not as the trouble spots of contemporary geo-politics". It is that ideal of global sustainability that Tagore would have spoken to – where regional cooperation across territorial boundaries strengthens connectivities and diminishes the salience of protracted contest and conflict. Similarly the notion of intercultural give and take between India and China contradicts the theory of any clash of civilizations. This is a useful model for Asia as we see it resurgent once again, and we seek open, transparent, balanced and equitable dialogue structures and patterns of cooperation across all the regions of our continent.

Tagore's vision of sustainability on a global scale, his cosmopolitanism, and his humanism, are of immense relevance today when we stress the values of inclusive development, and environmental sustainability as also education that creates individuals who transcend national boundaries to become citizens of the world.

Last May, I was present at Shanghai when the President of India, unveiled a bronze statue of Tagore at the crossing of Nanchang Road and Maoming Road very close to the spot where Tagore had stayed at the house of the young poet Xu Zhimo during a brief transit through Shanghai on his onward journey to Japan and North America in 1929. The event was a recognition of the enormous contribution made by Tagore in resurrecting the traditional friendship between India and China. Last month during the visit of Premier Wen Jiabao to India, the Indian Government announced that the study of the Chinese language would be introduced into the curriculum of secondary schools across the country. Tagore would have been overjoyed by this resolve to promote the scientific study of China through its language.

In many ways the Nalanda University project, which arises out of the decisions reached at the East Asia Summit, is an expression of this spirit. The road to Nalanda, giver of education and knowledge, echoes with the muffled footsteps of that period of shared history between India and China when the traditions of Buddhist pilgrimage and quest of scholarship defined the reaching out of these two countries to each other. In fact, the lore of the Tang Dynasty monk’s “Journey to the West” is like a trail leading to Nalanda. The tradition of Nalanda not only included monks like Faxian, Xuanzang and Yijing, but also other monks and scholars, prominently among them Kumarajiva, who is claimed by both India and China as their own worthy son.

In our own century, the 21st, the Government of India has sought to revive Nalanda as a centre of cultural exchange and scholarship between East, Southeast and South Asia. The Nalanda Mentor Group headed by Dr. Amartya Sen has been working to realize the vision of a truly global university, a holistic mix of the old and the new, of the past, the present and the future. Again, Tagore's happiness at this development would have been spontaneous. It is the modern day Xuanzangs and Bodhidharmas in both our countries and indeed in the rest of Asia that this University will target – so that this ancient rendezvous comes alive once again with all its attendant relevance and meaning. We are deeply appreciative of the fact that the Singapore Buddhist community is to make a financial contribution for the library of Nalanda University amounting to US$5 million. Last month, Premier Wen Jiabao announced a contribution of US$1 million for the Nalanda University.

Tagore's vision of India and China was founded on the realization that the true depths of the relationship between the two countries are embedded in the cultural interaction of yore between the two countries, in the mutual quest for ideas and innovation, trade, science, and in the culture of debate. Let us not forget how the halls of Nalanda resounded with the intense dialogues of scholars and monks defending their interpretations of the Buddhist canon - and here the India versus China or China versus India context was not a conflicted one, but one in which there was a healthy competition embellished by the space which each side gave the other. I believe these forefathers of ours in both countries had grasped the essence of the geo-civilizational paradigm that Tan Chung speaks of.

Tagore was ultimately a breaker of barriers, and in that sense he is very much of the 21st century. His appeal should cut across any nationalism that is narrowly defined or circumscribed by a limited appreciation of the ebb and flow of the tides of history. That sanity and rationality should prevail in the debates and encounters of countries like India and China is a principle that nobody can find exception about. Tagore's nationalism did not come in the way of the widest internationalism. This is a message for the youth of China and of India. Let their relationship flourish in the amrukunj – the mango grove – like the one at Santiniketan, a field of inspiration, with their personalities developing in harmony with the environment around them. Perhaps the theme of the amrukunj should define 2011 which is the Year of India-China Exchange!

Last month, during his visit to Delhi, Premier Wen Jiabao spoke to a crossection of media and cultural and academic personalities on how to improve perceptions of Indians and Chinese about each other. A number of interesting observations were made. Professor Manoranjan Mohanty, the eminent Indian sinologist, spoke of the two countries establishing Panchsheel centres for cultural, educational, economic and technological cooperation. One participant described the urgency of the need for changes in perceptions of each other and the gap that needs to be bridged. One of our film makers proposed joint ventures in film making which would resolve the alienation caused by 1962. One Chinese participant described Nalanda and Tagore as important icons for India and China. Yet another Chinese participant underlined the need for people from the two countries to understand each other directly rather than through the western prism, in an echo of Tagore! What came through was the need for an inclusive and plural approach given the multi-ethnic nature of both societies. The need for the two countries to evolve as hubs of creativity, in addition to being engines of economic growth, was stressed by Premier Wen. Rediscovering their civilizational ties not only on the basis of historical traditions but in the contemporary context through youth and technology was essential.

India and China share what is termed as a strategic and cooperative partnership for peace and prosperity today. Their relations have, in the last decade particularly, grown increasingly multi-faceted. These two big economies of Asia are interacting closely with each other, both in terms of bilateral trade, but also on issues concerning the global economic situation. The two governments have decided to institute a strategic economic dialogue as a measure of the increasing complexity and sophistication of their dialogue on economic issues.

It is a truism that between two such large countries such as ours, relations will be complex and with continuing areas of divergence. The challenge remains to build more convergence and common ground. I believe that the ballast must come from deeper dialogue which is defined by greater transparency, understanding the relevance and import of the words of thinkers like Tagore, realizing that a conflicted or contest-ridden relationship between India and China can do neither any good, that peace and stability for an Asian century flows from the enduring strength of a well-functioning interaction between these two countries. The concept of ‘Zhongguo-Yin Da Tong’ – or ‘Great Harmony between India and China’ can describe the future of our relations, if we use not only our complementarities in development and economic growth but also our great strengths in cultural and civilizational values, thus emerging as hubs of creativity and innovation, to create a fitting new paradigm for the India-China equation.
Realising Tagore’s Dream For Good Relations between India and China

Speech by George Yeo, then Singapore Minister For Foreign Affairs, at the conference “A Different Universalism: The Global Vision of Rabindranath Tagore and his Contemporaries” held in Kolkata, India, on 20 December 2010

The Chinese Temple in Sarnath

1. In the early 30's, a Chinese Buddhist monk from Beijing, Ven Dao Jie (道阶), while on a pilgrimage to India, resolved to rebuild a dilapidated Chinese temple in Sarnath that was established with the patronage of the Chinese Emperor in the 8th century during the Tang Dynasty. Unfortunately, he died before he could do it. Together with his disciple Ven De Yu (德玉) from Sichuan, a Singapore businessman Lee Choon Seng (李俊承) supported by Tan Yun Shan (谭云山) whom he knew well, decided to carry out this task. Lee Choon Seng donated the land for the building of the Buddhist Lodge in Singapore and was the first Chairman of the Singapore Buddhist Federation. He engaged an English engineer A. H. King to help in the restoration which was completed around 1939 and which is the temple we see today in Sarnath. The temple is located next to the Deer Park where the Buddha gave his first sermon, and turned the Dharmacakra or Falun (法轮) for the first time. Tan Yun Shan was very likely the man who got Rabindranath Tagore to write the preface for the opening of the renovated temple.

2. Tagore wrote: "The glorious history of the spiritual communication between China and India once raised its memorial on the sacred spot near Benares where Lord Buddha gave his first sermon, and turned the Dharmacakra or Falun (法轮) for the first time. Tan Yun Shan was very likely the man who got Rabindranath Tagore to write the preface for the opening of the renovated temple.

3. As we recall and celebrate the lifework of Tagore on his 150th birth anniversary, a recurring theme is his dream of pan-Asian solidarity, of friendship between India and China. This is an epic story of contact between two civilizations about which a new chapter is being opened today.

India-China Relations

4. Separated by the high Himalayas, the great deserts of Central Asia and the archipelagic waters of Southeast Asia, the history of contact between South and East Asia has been largely peaceful. The 1962 border war was an aberration which has left a scar in India.

5. Among ordinary Indians and Chinese, while each may have prejudices about the other, there is nevertheless a deep respect of each other as an ancient people stemming from long historical contact through the overland and maritime silk routes. The gift of South Asian Buddhism to East Asia, for example, has become a part of East Asian folklore. By the first half of the Tang Dynasty, Buddhism became one of the main religions in China and spread to Korea and Japan. Great libraries in the imperial capital, Chang’an, now Xi’an, were overseen by South Asian monks. The influence of South Asia on East Asia was both direct and subtle. The gift of South Asian Buddhism to East Asia, for example, has become a part of East Asian folklore. By the first half of the Tang Dynasty, Buddhism became one of the main religions in China and spread to Korea and Japan. Great libraries in the imperial capital, Chang’an, now Xi’an, were overseen by South Asian monks. The influence of South Asia on East Asia was both direct and subtle. Monks did not travel on their own. Whether overland or by sea, they travelled along trade routes opened and sustained by others. In a return favour, it was through the records of Chinese Buddhist monks that India during the British Raj re-discovered many aspects of its own Buddhist heritage. But it was not only Buddhism, every aspect of life was enriched by economic and cultural exchange including art, music and the sciences. This was an exchange which began in the early mists of history and continues till today.

6. In this century, the nature of the exchange between India and China is of the greatest importance. The re-emergence of these two huge civilizations on the global stage, still only at the beginning stages, is already altering the shape of global politics and economics. It is only a matter of time before China and India again become the two biggest economies in the world because of the sheer size of their populations. How India and China manage their relations in the coming years and decades will decide the big issue of war and peace in Asia. Without making light of the challenges, if these two countries have the wisdom to cooperate and resolve disputes in a peaceful way, bilaterally and internationally, Asia will be completely transformed and with it the rest of the world.

7. Unlike Europe which has no single dominant pole, China is historically the pole in East Asia and India the pole in South Asia. If China and India enjoy good relations, not only will East and South Asia benefit, the regions in between, Southeast Asia and Central Asia, will also benefit. That’s two thirds of the world. Tagore’s dream of pan-Asia was based not on political or economic dominance of one part of Asia or a single set of values forced on everyone but on friendship and cooperation which celebrates our common humanity and respects the natural diversity of human society. Tagore’s dream should be the dream of all Asians. If we realize his dream, we will bequeath to future generations a much better world. The signs are not unhopeful.

Tagore, Santiniketan, Nalanda, Bengal and Singapore

8. The celebration of Tagore’s life is one such manifestation. This conference is the fourth in a series which began in Harvard and continued in Singapore and Beijing. Tagore’s works in China are the most translated after Shakespeare. A major effort is now underway to re-translate Tagore directly from Bengali to Chinese as previous translations were through English or Hindi translations. In May this year, President Pratibha Patil unveiled a statue of Tagore in the centre of Shanghai while on a state visit to China.

9. Tagore visited China three times in the 1920s and made a profound impact on Chinese intellectuals. One of them, Tan Yun Shan, whom Tagore met in Singapore, was invited by him to build the Cheena Bhavan in Santiniketan which we visited yesterday. Representing Nehru who was ill at that time, Indira Gandhi opened the Bhavan in 1937 with the words: “May the Chinese Hall be a symbol of living contact between China and India’. Chiang Kai-shek visited it in 1942 and Zhou Enlai in 1957. Unfortunately, following the border war in 1962, bilateral relations took a sudden chill. When Tan Yun Shan died in 1983, Indira Gandhi paid this tribute to him: “Gurudev and my father had affection and regards for him. He identified himself with Santiniketan and contributed immensely to a better understanding between the civilizations of India and China”.

10. The revival of Nalanda as a secular university is part of this larger movement to re-establish an inter-connected Asia which had been compartmentalised by Western powers into colonies and buffer states. It is a project which has captured the mood of the times and was endorsed by the Leaders of the East Asia Summit recently. Established by a special Act of the Indian Parliament in August this year, Nalanda University is conceived as an international university which will engage a much wider region, indeed, of the entire global community. As envisaged by the Japanese member of the Mentors Group, Dr Ikuo Hirayama, who passed away last year, Nalanda should dedicate itself to the cause of peace. It is a cause all of us support.

11. That Bengalis play a disproportionate role in this effort should not be surprising, by which I refer to Amartya Sen, Sugata Bose and Tansen Sen. If you allow me, I would like to consider myself as an honorary Bengali too because Singapore was founded from Bengal as a daughter city of Kolkata. Tan Yun Shan and his son, Tan Chung (谭中), had close links with Singapore and Malaya. It was in Singapore that Subhas Chandra Bose established the Indian National Army. Reflecting on this,

12. Much has been made of the rivalry between China and India in recent months, some of which no doubt in the interest of third parties. The border remains in dispute. The media on both sides tend to sensationalise problems. Indian and Chinese leaders, however, are mindful that good bilateral relations are necessary for each to develop. Already China is India’s biggest trading partner, as Qing China was for Britain India in the 19th century. PM Manmohan Singh was right to say that each is too big to be contained by the other and the world is big enough for both to develop. As a member of the Nalanda Mentors Group, I was cheered that when China’s PM Wen Jiabao met PM Manmohan Singh in Hanoi during the East Asia Summit in October, he invited the Mentors Group to meet in China where the great monk, Xuan Zang, began his journey. In his recent visit to India from 15 to 17 December 2010, PM Wen included in his official delegation the Chinese member of the Nalanda Members Group Prof Wang Bangwei. China’s strong support of the Nalanda revival and of Tagore’s cause is a good sign.

13. We need a sense of history, of how much our forebears have benefited and learnt from one another. Without this humility and a profound respect for the contribution of others to our own well-being, we will suffer hubris and make terrible mistakes. It will be good if scholars from all over Asia and beyond come together to research, compile and present how much Indians, Chinese and others have learnt from one another in different fields over the centuries. What Joseph Needham did for Science and Civilization in China, we should try to do for the history of contact between South and East Asia. It will be good if the new Nalanda University is associated with such an undertaking. Tagore said: “The highest education is that which does not merely give us information but makes our life in harmony with all existence”. This is also the spirit of the Buddha and the spirit of Nalanda, and should be our common spirit.

KOLKATA IN DECEMBER is a city of conferences. An international conference on Rabindranath Tagore, held there in mid-December last year, stood out nevertheless. It was the fourth and concluding parley in a series of meetings that had begun at Harvard and travelled to Singapore and Beijing. The Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre (NSC) at ISEAS had organised the Singapore leg of the conferences. The final conference, organised by the Netaji Research Bureau and the Kolkata Museum of Modern Art, took place as a build-up to the 150th birth anniversary of Tagore – Bengal’s favourite literary son, India’s national poet, and the first Asian to win the Nobel Prize for Literature.

Present at the finale was Minister George Yeo, ISEAS Chairman Prof Wang Gungwu, ISEAS Director Ambassador K Kesavapany, NSC Head Prof Tansen Sen, myself and others.

The day before the conference began, a group of about two dozen participants visited Santiniketan, a town in West Bengal’s Birbhum district that houses Viswa-Bharati University, which Tagore set up. The university and his own presence at Santiniketan turned a provincial town into a major place of secular pilgrimage for those interested in advancing world understanding through scholarship, art and literature. The itinerant participants, drawn from China, Japan, the United States, Singapore and India itself, cheerfully followed the almost-century-long Tagore trail to Santiniketan. For many, it was the first trip. For me, it was a brief return to a place that I had first visited as a teenager in the 1970s, long before I had arrived in Singapore in 1984.

As the coach for Santiniketan left the Taj Bengal Hotel in Kolkata, I heard the police pilot car turn on the siren. This was in honour of Singapore Foreign Minister George Yeo, who was travelling to Santiniketan before delivering the keynote speech at the conference. Kolkata’s traffic, as adversarial as its politics, parted magically, and the coach took off on the nearly 200-km-long trip to Santiniketan. A convoy of back-up cars followed the coach as it sped along. I glowed in the borrowed glory of the dignitaries with whom I was sharing the journey.

The companionship of the police brought back memories of my years as a journalist with The Statesman newspaper in Kolkata. Once, in the early 1980s, protesting junior doctors had confined a senior hospital official to his room, in a pressure tactic called a gherao, to extract concessions from the government. The police were sent in to break up the gherao, in the course of which a six-foot-tall plainclothes policeman wielding a baton chased away the journalists trying to cover the event. It was not a nice way to make friends with the media. But here I was now, enjoying the hospitality of the... same police force and remembering the same doctors, many of whom were as proficient at reciting Tagore (and quoting Marx) as they were at performing a tracheostomy and organising a gherao. There is almost nothing in Kolkata from which you can take out Tagore. Even the sewers begin to sing the moment two lovers remember a line of his.

I tried to hum a Tagore song, but could not, for my heart was heavy with the faded claims of the city that I had left more than 25 years ago. Jilted streets and rebuffed localities accosted me. “You’ve left me for Orchard Road, haven’t you? Cheat!” College Street said. She spoke fiercely, as if I had been in love with her. I had. “That is nothing,” Park Circus interjected accusingly. “He grew up here. Now he is growing old without me. But look, I am still young without him.” Mercifully, the route to Santiniketan by-passed these roads and places; otherwise, they would have plucked me from the very coach. As we passed through Hooghly district, my ancestral home, too, remained out of sight. However, it glanced at me reproachfully over the same fields where the fathers of today’s farmers had tilled the familial soil when I had been a child. “Won’t you come in at least for a cup of tea?” my grandfather’s house taunted me. “Or am I too humble for the distinguished company you are in?” I could take it no more. “It is you who pushed me away, you who rejected me, you whose spacious lives and roaming loves had no room for me,” I cried. “How dare you mock me now?” I shouted, looking them directly in the eye. It was a noiseless shout but it woke me up. I had been dozing.

My mood improved considerably when we arrived in Santiniketan.

Our group was ushered into the residence of another Bengali Nobel laureate, the economist Amartya Sen of Harvard, who has written on Tagore with fellow-traveller’s grasp of Indian reality. Professor Sen welcomed us to his sprawling lawn, where we sat in a Socratic circle, ate Bengali savoury shingara and drank tea and coffee. Engaging us in conversation that was banter one moment and heavy the next, he moved effortlessly from anecdotes of family history that lay spread across the great house, to the academic mysteries of Harvard, to the altogether different urgency of the situation in Myanmar. Professor Sen’s passionate commitment to the life of the mind, and the conversational energy and verve with which he conveyed it, held us spellbound for the better part of the hour, till it was time to move unwillingly on to our other appointments.

At Cheena Bhavana, ancient history put recent history in its dyspeptic place. A bibliophile’s paradise, the centre exudes an almost physical craving for the cultural closeness that China and India displayed in the long centuries preceding their short-lived war of 1962. The dusty smell of the elderly books evoked the earthy steps of those who had sought to bring the two civilizations closer. We moved closer to the soul of the great poet, an avid international traveller himself, during our visit to the Tagore Museum. The photographs and other artefacts housed there are simple enough for a child to understand and profound enough for her to grow up on. I am not growing up but growing old, but I felt embarrassingly young as we headed out of the building for lunch and the return journey to Kolkata. I had retraced a part of my life in the course of a Tagorean day.

You can take a Bengali out of Tagore’s Bengal: You cannot take Bengal’s Tagore out of him.

Gurudev, as he is known throughout the world, set out as a pilgrim in 1924, and again in 1927, visiting Malaya, Indonesia, Indo-China and the Far East. It was during one of these sojourns that I had the rare privilege of meeting him in person. It was really a memorable occasion in my life to fall at the feet of so distinguished a person. I was so inspired by his personality and the fund of knowledge in him that I proceeded to Visva-Bharati to take charge of the Cheena Bhavan. This opportunity afforded me the chance to avail myself of his scholarly guidance. The period I spent at Visva-Bharati was the best in my scholastic career.

The experience obtained by me at this residential college, situated as it is in a country setting, gaining personal contacts with distinguished scholars from all lands, under the direct inspiration and guidance of this great teacher, was a ‘godsend’ to me in the vast field of knowledge, bearing practical values in life viewed in the light of the eternal theme of spiritual thought, namely to seek, know and realise – “the One in the Many”.

It is indeed very gratifying that an increasing number of Malayans in all walks of life patronise the Tagore Society, Singapore, to emulate and propagate the cherished aims of Gurudev.
Celebrating 150 years of Rabindranath Tagore

Tagore Unveiled. From left: HE Dr. T.C.A. Raghavan, High Commissioner of India in Singapore; Ambassador K. Kesavapany, Director ISEAS; Mr. S.M. Krishna, Honourable Minister of External Affairs, Government of India; Prof. Wang Gungwu, Chairman, ISEAS; Mr. Gopinath Pillai, Ambassador-at-Large, and Prof. Saranindranath Tagore, National University of Singapore. Presented to the upcoming Indian Heritage Centre (IHC), the bust will remain at the ISEAS Library till the inauguration of the IHC.

On 26th June, 1927, the farewell luncheon for Rabindranath Tagore in Singapore was attended by Consuls General for Germany, America and France. In 2011 the unveiling ceremony was also attended by ambassadors from various countries.

Mr. Jawhar Sircar, Secretary, Ministry of Culture, Government of India, garlanding the bust of Rabindranath Tagore during his visit to the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre on 10th May, 2011.
Rabindranath Tagore has said – “The growth and decay of civilisation is not the gain or loss of external possession but of internal wealth. That civilisation is more advanced which has more accentuated the greatness and responsibility of human life and it may be said without fear of challenge that in the absence of such accentuation, civilisation loses its glory.”

Tagore lived up to his dictum. It is universally acknowledged that his life and work added to the treasures accumulated by the human spirit through the ages with poetic productions of great beauty and insight. His noble personality towered over the passions, hatreds and strife which disfigured civilisation in his lifetime, and continue to disfigure it today.

Asians remember with pride the occasion when the great Indian poet renounced, in noble and stirring accents, his British knighthood in protest against brutal British repression in the Punjab in 1919. “The time has come,” wrote the poet to Lord Chelmsford, “when badges of honour make our shame glaring in the incongruous context of humiliation, and I for my part wish to stand, shorn of all special distinctions, by the side of those of my countrymen who, for all their so-called insignificance, are liable to suffer a degradation not fit for human beings.”

A creative master of Bengali prose and poetry, Tagore wrote almost as well in English. From his English translations of his Bengali works, we get intimations of the beauty and excellence of the Bengali originals.

Great men bequeath their treasures not just to their own nation, but to the whole world. Tagore is a great man by any standard. We in Singapore join with pleasure in this year’s worldwide centenary celebration of Rabindranath Tagore. We would also do well to take the opportunity to remind ourselves of Tagore’s message that the quality of our lives and of our civilisation depends more on the internal wealth that we can accumulate than on external possessions.

Let us not forget in our day-to-day lives and mundane preoccupations that man in his habitation of this earth has accumulated a wealth of deep and abiding beauty. These are the things which make civilisation worth preserving, and world peace worth achieving.
“The greatness of Tagore is not confined to India; he belongs to Asia and the world. The wide range of his thought, his emphasis on the dignity and soul of man, his understanding of human frailty had an influence which has reached far beyond the boundaries of his own lifetime, and is still an enriching source of inspiration to mankind.

– Tunku Abdul Rahman Putra, Prime Minister, Federation of Malaya in a message to commemorate the centenary of Tagore in 1961

“It is indeed an honour for me to present Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore’s bust to the Indian Heritage Centre on the occasion of the 150th birth anniversary of the great poet, thinker, philosopher and educationist. While embarking on his voyage to the Southeast Asian countries in 1927, Gurudev Tagore said: “We have embarked on a pilgrimage to India beyond its modern political boundaries, to see the signs of the history of India’s entry into the universal”.

The objective of Tagore’s voyage was to explore India’s millennia-old cultural and historical links with Southeast Asia, with humanistic ideas, religious values, music, philosophy and culture. The Institute of Southeast Asian Studies is indeed the most appropriate place to hold today’s event. The final destination of the bust will be the Indian Heritage Centre and I am grateful to all those associated with it for this wonderful initiative.

– Mr SM Krishna, Minister of External Affairs, Government of India, 5th May, 2011

“A bust of Rabindranath Tagore has been installed to initiate the celebrations in Singapore of the poet’s 150th birth anniversary. This was supported by the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies (ISEAS), the Tagore Society and many others. The initiative was greatly expedited by the Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR) which despatched a bronze bust, commissioned from noted sculptor Gautam Pal. The presence in Singapore of the External Affairs Minister of India Shri S.M. Krishna and a beautifully organised ceremony by the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre led to an evocative morning function during which the bust was unveiled on the 5th of May, 2011.

We are grateful to our many friends in Singapore for the help they have provided in this endeavour.”

– HE Dr TCA Raghavan, High Commissioner of India in Singapore, 5th May, 2011

“One of the areas of research at the Nalanda-Sriwijaya Centre at this Institute is the issue of connectivities within Asia, in both the pre-modern and modern eras. As part of its research, the Centre organised a well-attended conference on the Asian travels of the great Indian poet, Nobel Laureate Rabindranath Tagore. Tagore embodies the sense of a culture that is profoundly Indian, Asian and universal at the same time. His inclusive vision of Asia, in particular, is being brought to life today by geopolitical and economic shifts that are moving Asia closer to the centrestage of history.

Thus, when High Commissioner Raghavan said that the Government of India was willing to present a bust of the poet, I was overjoyed, particularly since Tagore had visited Singapore in 1927. It is appropriate that this bust be housed at the Indian Heritage Centre. However, since the Centre will be set up only in two to three years, ISEAS is more than willing to house the poet’s bust in the meantime in our Library. It is extremely kind of His Excellency, Minister Krishna, to be with us today to unveil Tagore’s bust. It will be a strong reminder of the enduring links between India and Singapore.”

– Ambassador K Kesavapany, Director, Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, Singapore, 5th May, 2011
To assist in disseminating the research results of projects related to the Centre’s interests, a Nalanda-Sriwijaya Series has been initiated. The first volume under this series is entitled Nagapattinam to Suvarnadwipa: Reflections on the Chola Naval Expeditions to Southeast Asia. A second volume with the title Early Interactions between South and Southeast Asia: Reflections on Cross-Cultural Exchange is forthcoming.

The Centre has also launched the NSC Research Series, which provides NSC fellows with an avenue to present the outcome of their research undertaken and supported by the Centre. The first volume under this series is entitled Preserving Cultural Identity through Education: The Schools of the Chinese Community in Calcutta, India by Zhang Xing.

A web-based publication series is a further element of the Centre’s publishing programme. Entitled the NSC Working Paper Series, this series provides an avenue for swift publication and wide dissemination of research conducted or presented within the Centre, and of studies engaging fields of enquiry of relevance to the Centre. The first paper of this series is John Miksic’s The Buddhist-Hindu Divide in Premodern Southeast Asia.
